

Jewelry experts weighed in on what Markle's ring could potentially look like prior to the engagement (which we all knew was inevitable), and now they're also making predictions on the wedding bands. Tanya Dukes, jewelry and fashion editor/stylist and former accessories editor at Brides, believes that it's basically a certainty that the royal wedding bands will feature Welsh gold, since it's been a tradition within the family that dates back to Prince Harry's grandparents. Dukes also noted that Markle frequently wears yellow-gold jewelry, so a wedding band of Welsh gold would mirror her own personal style. The gold that's been favored by the royal family since 1911 also has a slightly pink hue to it, which makes it even more one-of-a-kind and fit for a princess. Dukes was fairly spot-on in terms of her engagement-ring guesses, so we trust her wedding-ring judgement.

According to Entertainment Tonight, the royal family has used this specific Welsh gold from the Clogau St. David's Mine for the past century. From the queen mother to Princess Diana to Kate Middleton, the royal wedding rings have featured Clogau gold. No pressure, Meghan and Harry.

And, lo and behold, it looks like Dukes's royal jewelry prediction might be correct again. Ben Roberts, the Clogau managing director, confirmed to Reuters that Markle's wedding ring will most likely be made in their London workshop, and will feature Welsh gold with a signature dragon engraving. Roberts also expects her wedding band will be made from a lighter shade of gold to match her engagement ring, as opposed to Clogau's distinct rose gold. "Looking at her engagement ring, it will probably have to match, so it will probably be yellow," he said to Reuters.
