

Tanya Dukes, a jewelry editor and stylist, has noticed the trend's "primed" reemergence in the accessories market, too. It's not just turquoise either: Silver, coral, malachite, and opal pieces are commonly used in pieces the Southwest inspires. Designers like Anna Sheffield and Mociun have hinted at southwestern flavor with a touch of luxury thanks to the inclusion of diamonds in their work.

"Southwest-inspired accessories signal a certain pastoral, unpretentious and archetypically American style," Dukes tells Fashionista in an email. "There's been a lot of nostalgia lately and when it comes to the conversation of the U.S., its politics and identity. That can't help but prompt creatives to revisit some of the foundational signposts of American culture."
